PREFACE

For centuries prior to World War I, Jewish intellectuals and scholars gathered collections of rare manuscripts on Judaism and Hebraica, manuscripts that have long been serving as a vitalizing force in the perpetuation and growth of Jewish intellectual and religious life.

These treasures were the property of libraries, academies, and private individuals until shortly after the Russian Revolution, when most of them were gathered by the new government and sent to Leningrad and Moscow. How to locate these manuscripts, how to obtain catalogues of them, and how to secure microfilms of those presently unavailable to scholars outside the U.S.S.R. were my main concerns when I visited Russia with my colleague, Professor Christian O. Arndt, in August 1956.

The first step was to contact the Oriental Institute of the Academy of Science in Leningrad, and libraries and other institutions of higher learning in Leningrad and Moscow. In the Oriental Institute of the Academy of Science and in the Department of Oriental Studies of the University of Leningrad, I met a number of distinguished scholars of Hebrew and Islamic studies, who not only train other specialists but devote much of their time and energy to discovery of vital information from their magnificent resources.

In addition, the Oriental Institute publishes annually a scholarly magazine in which research is described and recorded. Thus, in the issues of 1955 and 1956 there are articles by K. B. Starkova, a well-known student of the Golden Age of Spain, presenting heretofore unpublished letters of the famous Hebrew poet Judah Halevi, which she discovered among the Institute collections. In the same issue, the historical implications of the book Yosippon are discussed by Professor H.A. Metschersky; and the late A.Y. Borisov sheds new light on the life of Ali ben Suleiman, the Karaite lexicographer who lived in Jerusalem at the end of the eleventh and the beginning of the twelfth centuries.

The Oriental Institute also houses a number of collections of manuscripts, one of the more outstanding being the Friedlander. This group is rich in Bible commentaries, linguistic material, extensive Karaitic literature, Kabalah, and valuable documents dealing with the history of Russian and Oriental Jewish communities. Also now available at the Institute is a hand-written descriptive catalogue of four volumes, arranged by the Russian scholar Jonah Ginzberg, which is now being revised for publication by M.N. Zislín, a member of the Institute staff. Among the rarer items is a scroll combining the Pentateuch and the Prophets with the signature of the owner, Sai'd, who writes that he sold it in the year A.M. 4607 (847 C.E.); the writing is certainly much earlier.

In the public library in Leningrad I examined the famous Firkowitsch collection. Abraham Firkowitsch came from the Crimean peninsula, and in his zeal to prove that the Karaites had settled in the Crimea for a much longer period than previously accepted, traveled to Cairo and elsewhere and succeeded in bringing together the largest collection of Hebrew, Samaritan, and early Karaitic manuscripts in the world. The Leningrad library bought a part of the Firkowitsch collection in 1876 and the rest after his death.

The second Firkowitsch collection is not only extensive, but extremely valuable. It contains some 159 scrolls on parchment and leather, about 1,000 Hebrew manuscripts, and over 2,000 Arabic manuscripts. In addition, it includes over 1,500 manuscripts of the Hebrew Bible and Biblical fragments. At least fourteen of these, dated from 929 to 1121, are for the most part the text as fixed by Aaron ben Asher, the great Masoretic authority who lived in the first half of the tenth century.

The Firkowitsch collection also contains an old fragment of a copy of the letter sent by Joseph, the Jewish king of the Khazars to Chisdai ibn Shaprut. This document was published by Alexander Harkavy in 1875.

In the Leningrad Library I examined and microfilmed the famous Codex of the Bible (B 19a). This Codex was copied in Old Cairo by Samuel b. Jacob in 1008, "from the ....books prepared by Aaron b. Asher." The Library also houses the Antonin collection, consisting of about 1,200 fragments of the Cairo Geniza which were brought together by Antonin, a Russian Archimandrite in Jerusalem. Other Library collections include the archives of noted Hebrew scholars and writers such as Israel Zinberg, David Magid, Gotlieber, and Wilenchik.

In the Lenin Library of Moscow, I examined a two-volume catalogue of the Baron David Guenzberg collection and microfilmed a great number of them. This collection consists of about 6,000 Mss. and fragments, a great number of them originally belonging to the collections of Joseph Josel Guenzberg and his children. The Guenzberg items deal with lexicography, Judaeo-Arabic and Aramaic commentaries on the Bible, liturgy, medieval Hebrew literature, Responsa, Karaite literature, Shabbathai Zevi, Kabbalah, and mysticism.

All told there are between fifteen and twenty thousand Hebrew manuscripts and fragments in the learned institutions of Leningrad and Moscow.

My meetings with the Russian scholars brought about an understanding on the exchange of printed books on Hebrew language and scripts in the public library and the Oriental Institute in Leningrad. This exchange arrangement enabled me also to secure several Torahs which originally belonged to the Tsar's Asiatic Museum. The cultural exchange applies only to Leningrad and not to Moscow, where the microfilms had to be purchased in cash.

This catalogue lists in brief 165 microfilms consisting of 200 selected items of Russian manuscripts, which constitutes Part I of the manuscripts acquired from the Guenzberg, Firkowitsch, Antonin and Friedlander collections. I hope to follow this with Part II in the near future.

I am particularly indebted to the directors of the libraries in Leningrad and Moscow, and to the scholars and Head of the Oriental Institute of the Academy of Science in Leningrad for their friendship and help during and after my visit to the U.S.S.R. I shall always cherish this cordial relationship with gratitude and deep appreciation.

Thanks are also due to Dr. G. Aloni, director of the Israel Institute of Hebrew Manuscripts for his help in providing me with catalogue material. Description of Guenzberg items is based in main on his catalogue.

I also wish to thank Professor Ernest L. Hettich, Director of the University's Libraries, for his interest and encouragement.

Last but not least my everlasting gratitude to Mr. and Mrs. William Rosenthal, ardent patrons of the New York University Library of Judaica and Hebraica, for making this publication possible.
